The curriculum of Compulsory Studies in Organizational Communication consists of course and project work that familiarizes the student with the practicalities of dissertation work and helps the student map out and elaborate on different theoretical and methodological streams of literature in the broader field of organizational communication and management studies. The module consists of active participation in the "Getting Started" and "Moving Forward" courses, along with self-directed study of Research Traditions in Organizational Communication, Methodological Approaches to Organizational Communication, and International Doctoral Colloquium.

Students may substitute some of these studies with PhD courses offered by various international higher education institutions and academic associations. However, students must consult their thesis advisors for instructions and approval when considering this option.

Research-Related Studies 12 ECTS

Research-Related Studies consist of various courses, seminars, workshops and specifically tailored independent learning assignments that support the PhD student's own research. PhD students decide on the content of this module together with their thesis advisors.
